BREAKING THE WISHBONE. When to Lose the Wish and When to Win It.

A charming young widow who wants of whom you should beware. She is very tantalizing, chic, clever, and, oh, so awfully sorry you didn't get your wish! The young widow is a meet mind reader and knows just what And the lamps are he in the dusky street, your thoughts are while you are holding the bone and looking down into her It is time to start for the shores of sleepeyes. If you have to look up into a widow's eyes, there may be some hope for you, but when she looks up and you look down she can read every one of your thoughts. By the way, there is only one, only has been one, only can be one, thought passing through a man's mind when he is breaking a wishbone with a charming young widow-possession! She knows it as plainly as though written indelibly upon your forehead. That is her particular forte. And when you break the bone and find yourself possessed of the short end she will look up into your eyes with a look that will cause your poor back hair to crimp and say, with that pitying tone of voice never so well modulated as by a widow: "I am so sorry you lost!"

No matter what the after result of a good dinner may bring forth, you cannot help but hie yourself away to some quiet resort obscure from prying and meddling eyes and bury your disappointment in beer, books or blues.

But when you break a wishbone with a sweet young girl it is a very different thing. Sweet young girls' hearts were made to be broken like the wishbone. You secure a deal of paradise while breaking bones with a sweet young girl, whereas you get generally wormwood and gall when you break bones with a Where no waves beat and no winds roar. fair widow. You throw all your art into the act of breaking a bone with a young girl, but when you break a bone with a fair widow you throw your heart in against her art, and she beats you nine times out of ten.

The best place to break a bone with a fair widow is in the corner of a snug sitting room, with the lights turned low. A man's heart fire glows more vividly upon his cheeks then; also it is fers earnestness of purpose and is ever ready for a tilt of hearts against arts. You might win a prize in the lottery of He raised his glittering weapon up and gave life if you would break a bone with a fair young girl with your heart as fixed upon the one purpose—possession—as it was with the widow.

Did von ever break a bone with a staid old aunt whose fortune you hoped to possess? If you lose your wish, your fortune is made, for she'll put you down as a real nice nephew without sordid fancies, but if you win she'll pierce you with a look and say:

"I expected you wanted me to hurry up and die." Always make it a point to lose your wish when breaking a bone with an expectant aunt who has a fortune.

When a colored gentleman breaks the wishbone of a turkey, he always throws the shorter end over his left shoulder. That means that he wishes next year's hen and turkey roosts will not be locked nor guarded by a bulldog.

My wife broke a bone with me last Thanksgiving. She won her wish, but has not got it. I haven't been very witty this season; hence have not written the way to that sealskin sack .- H. S.

Reflections,

The kind word, costing the giver but little, may make glad a lifetime. A word may be an illuminated thought and become the most treasured of keepsakes.

Some there are whose kindness is so delicately rendered as to make it beyond description.

That creed that is lived out in freely caring for others and doing kind deeds is not to be doubted.

The heart has a language that records deeds as well as words, according to its own interpretation. The Joy of It. Thanksgiving day is almost gone, And peace reigns overhead, / And mother's joy-her own sweet boy-Is trundled off to bed.

Yet what are those uncarthly sounds That pierce the midnight air? And what's that throbbing noise we hear Come running down the stair?

It is our little household pet, Who tosses upon high And wages an unequal fight With turkey and mince pie. Philosophical.

Wife (gazing at the baby)-Think, darling, how much we have to be thankful for this Thanksgiving. Husband-That's so. It might have been twins.
